
Foreword ****

On this Opening Day of the New York World's Fair 1939, it is obvious that the building of this exposition has stimulated thought throughout the world about the real significance to humanity of man's economic and social resources. The Fair's construction period has demonstrated the world's willingness to develop higher standards of individual living and the potentials of world peace.  Perhaps only those of us who have grown up with the Fair can comprehend all that it represents in the way of detailed study, human ingenuity and actual man power. To us was entrusted the vision of an international exposition that might turn the course of humanity into easier highroads. In proceeding from that unselfish philosophy, we looked deep into human history, less for precedent than for guidance along new ways, for what is past is prologue. We looked back through one hundred and fifty years of progress in business, industry, the arts and social life, not merely to commemorate that period but that we might build more wisely toward the future. The science of living has made tremendous strides since George Washington was inaugurated first president of the United States. None of us dares admit, however, that we shall stop with what has been done. We have only to maintain our faith and courage and hold high our ideals of a better World of Tomorrow.  The New York World's Fair was conceived by the men and women of the city whose name it bears; it was taken up by the American people; and brought into being by the nations of the world. As nations and individuals, we owe it to ourselves and posterity that none of us rest until the lessons of this international exposition be crystallized in true progress and world peace.

The first official lighting of the New York World's Fair presents an impressive demonstration of scientific phenomena. Through ten successive impulses from Cosmic Rays the various sectors of the Fair will be energized. At each impulse flashing lights in the Trylon and bell-like notes in the Perisphere will be seen and heard for twenty miles as one area of the Fair after another glows with light.

The assembled audience will hear the final arrangements being made between the Fair's representative, Dr. Gerald Wendt, in the Perisphere, and Professor William H. Barton, Jr., at the ray detector in New York City's Planetarium. They will then witness the actual reception of the Cosmic Rays.
